Winter to perform here

By J. P. Rool
Johnny Winter is still alive and well. And working as hard as ever. Contacted in New Orleans shortly before Christmas, Winter talked about his current tour which will bring him to Charleston next Sunday.

Winter last toured to promote the release of his album "Still Alive and

Freakshow

Well." He hit only major cities, he said, places where FM radio stations had made his music known to the public.

This tour is to promote his next album ("Saints and Sinners" due near the end of this month) and he's hitting some towns he's never been to before.

The reception, he said, has been good. "I was a little worried at first," he said. "We've only played the bigger cities before, and we're still pretty much of an underground act. I was afraid people in some of these places hadn't even heard of us."

Nevertheless, the crowds have been good and Winter's pleased.

"We're doing the same kind of material we usually do," he admitted. "There's some stuff from the new album, but it seems people don't want to hear new stuff till it's on a record."

Winter says he's never been to West Virginia but he's anxious to get to Charleston and see the reaction he'll get. His brother Edgar was here recently and Johnny says he wants to do "at least as well as he."

That remark prompted a question about sibling rivalry between the two Winters, but Johnny denied it.

"Rivalry? Not really. Not much. There was a lot more before Edgar made it. He was always Johnny's little brother, you know. People wouldn't even call him by his name, just say 'Johnny's brother.'"

"I was always the band leader and workin' and Edgar was always puttin' down my music, sayin' rock'n'roll wasn't good music. He was into technical stuff and sayin' rock and blues wasn't legitimate, that he was into good music. It got better after he got a hit single," Winter admitted.

Winter also admitted that though he's never had a hit single, the "Saints and Sinners" album has a couple of possibilities. "I don't want to talk about it right now, because I don't know exactly what we're going to do with them. We might release them as singles or we might not. I just don't know right now. But there's two that can probably make it. We'll probably do them in Charleston."

When I talked with Winter by telephone that day, he was just getting ready for his New Orleans concert before taking a Christmas break. He resumed the tour the day after Christmas and will end it Jan. 20.

He admitted that concerts are hard for him to get into, but that once they begin, he's fine.

"My biggest problem is to stay calm," he admitted. "I'm always nervous before I go on. A couple of hours before the show, like now, I can't stand it. I pace and worry, but once I get out there and the music starts I'm okay."

"Yeah, I'm looking forward to Charleston. I don't know if many people's heard our stuff up there, but we'll try and give 'em a good show."

The show is 8 p.m. next Sunday at the Civic Center and tickets are still available. It's another of those things Terry Lowry calls "festival standing."
